

QUIT OLD PARTIES FOR PROGRESSIVE, CONFERENCE HEARS

Hundreds Enthusiastic Over Plans Outlined by Bull Moose.

Judge Oscar Hundley of Alabama was first called.
"We should get down to business," he said. "I am requested to treat the subject of the South in five minutes, which I can't do. Therefore I think we should go into executive session of the national committee, at which I would be glad to present various matters that should be presented only under such circumstances."

Judge Hundley moved to have the national committee meet at once. "This national committee has never had a meeting so far as I know," he declared. "I suppose in time it will get together and some matters will be presented to it. We are going to meet some time for the consideration of all the business that will need it."

Hot Under Collar.
Judge Hundley plainly was not under the collar. His demand for some business and less oratory was seconded from various quarters. Senator Plinn, of Pittsburgh, declared that the national committee ought to get together soon if it was to transact business in time for the members to leave town on the train for the next morning.

Senator Dixon asked all members of the national committee present to rise, and only a handful got up. Then Judge Hundley was, on motion, invited to address the gathering at such length as he might choose, which he proceeded to do.

The plea of the men who stole the Republican nomination last June," he said, "was that the business of stealing delegates had been going on so long it had become a habit. Well, I defended a colored boy once on a charge of stealing chickens, and urged that he was a kleptomaniac, that kleptomania was a disease, not a crime. The court said it was a disease, but not a defense against a larceny charge, and locked up my client. So was in the late election. The Republican party stole the nomination and pleaded kleptomania; but the court of ballots decided against them."

Judge Hundley told about the great showing the Progressives made in the South, where they beat the Republicans in every district, county or State where they had been robbed by the national committee's action. He then turned to the majority running from 2 to 1 up to 5 to 1.

Finish Work Today.
The conference delegates planned to end their two-day session this afternoon. The special train that brought the New York and New England delegations was scheduled to leave at 5:30 o'clock. Resolutions to be adopted at today's session contained the recommendations of Dr. Walter Way to adopt the plan of the Socialist party in the United States to organize the party into the largest dues-paying association in the world; the idea of former Senator Beveridge expressed in his banquet speech last night to work toward the wiping out of the sectional lines created by the civil war; the continued speaking and propaganda spreading advocated by Dr. Benjamin Pay Mills, of Chicago; and the plan of establishing bureaus, urged in the address of Miss Jane Addams.

It was not at all unlikely that the enthusiasm aroused late yesterday by Dr. Mills, when he predicted the election of Colonel Roosevelt in 1916, would find expression in a resolution endorsing the chief Bull Moose party's next candidate for the Presidency.

Delegations in Session.
Meetings of nearly every State delegation were held before the session was called to order in Orchestra Hall. Very few of the delegates left the city last night, and another large attendance was assured today.

The leaders who have been advocating peace within the ranks of the party were fairly certain that there would be no friction during the closing hours of the conference. Rules were in force that none but national committeemen and chairmen of State organizations had the privilege of speaking on the floor of the conference.

Full of Harmony.
During the conference yesterday there was not a word or a note of dissent or inharmonious. Everybody, and some scores of the national leaders who were heard in brief addresses during the day, was of one mind.

The conference proper lasted from 10:30 to 5 o'clock, and then was resumed at 6:30 o'clock at the great "family dinner" at the Auditorium, where more exchange of views took place. This completed the public sessions.

Reasons why the Progressive party must and will hold itself aloof from all dickering and dealings with either of the old parties met with universal approval.

The leader's keynote of purpose and absolute independence was wildly cheered.

Senator Dixon read at the session a number of telegrams that had been received concerning proposals of reunion with either of the old parties. One was from John M. Parker, national committeeman of New Orleans, who urged that "the principal danger lay in engaging alliances" and that "the only safety lay in the independence of our banner to the masses" and so straight ahead in the fight.

Frank M. Evans, of Helena, who was Progressive candidate for governor, wired to like effect. So did Arthur Capper, of Kansas, but for whom the courts would not allow all his votes to be counted.

Miss Addams Talks.
Jane Addams, of Hull House fame, was presented to present a plan for educational and propaganda work. The plan proposed six bureaus as follows: Education and publicity. Legislative reference. Social and industrial justice. Conservation. Foreign government. One chief of the entire service would be named by the national committee, and each bureau would have a director, and their work would be to conduct educational and propaganda work along the lines suggested by the titles of the various bureaus.

Judge W. H. Himebaugh, one of the two Progressive Congressmen-elect from Illinois, admitted less enthusiasm about "getting together" with the opposition at home than he felt about getting to Washington and at work in the effort to carry out the party's legislative program.

Here the program was smashed by a chorus of calls for "Perkins! Perkins!" and George W. Perkins, of New York, was demanded from all sides. The crowd would not be satisfied, and he had to be sent for to come from the sessions of the executive committee.

There's the guy that put the Bull Moose party on its feet! yelled some body when Perkins stepped on the platform, and the cheering was renewed.

Mr. Perkins made a brief talk, touching on the practical objects of the movement and the practical measures by which to attain results. He had always been in favor of the principles and purposes for which the Progressives were fighting, and was enlisted in the movement because he recognized in it the practical instrumentality through which at last to get results.

Mrs. Maud Howe Elliott, daughter of Julia Ward Howe, author of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," described herself as "from darkest Rhode Island" when she took the platform, and told how the women raised money for the Progressive fight in that State.

Mrs. Elliott's few moments on the stand won her all the honors among the women orators of the day. When she left there was a demand to sing "The Battle Hymn of the Republic." It was started pretty thinly, but Mrs. Elliott and three or four other women were able to carry the strains until the resounding chorus of "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah" was reached, when the audience got into the swing and made the hall echo.

James Hayes, of Virginia, colored, was officiated by one who "last fall" when the battle hymn was written.

He spoke of what the Progressive movement was for, and for the work of real emancipation, and predicted a complete victory in 1916.

Send For Mr. Munsey.
There was a chorus of calls for "Munsey, Munsey," and the convention concerning proposals of reunion with either of the old parties, and predicted a complete victory in 1916.
